Beyond Compare 4 Mac software is a powerful software for comparing and merging. When designing a device, an engineer may start by defining a desired minimum surface resistance, such as approximately 30Ω/sq. This impedance value is necessary to prevent large voltages from charging the display screen in an active matrix liquid crystal display. This may be done by placing a low resistance material (e.g., thin film resistors, or TFR) on the device substrate. This insures that the voltage does not build up on a particular small portion of the device, but instead provides a uniform voltage distribution throughout the surface of the device. A typical process for manufacturing the TFR is to apply a metal layer onto a substrate, such as a glass substrate, by a sputtering or vapor deposition process. The metal layer is then subjected to an etching process that removes the metal from regions other than the device areas. A TFR structure is then formed by depositing or growing a dielectric layer over the substrate and over the metal lines. The dielectric layer can be silicon dioxide and/or silicon nitride, depending on the desired properties of the TFR. The TFR structure is then etched to form trenches or holes having a depth commensurate to the thickness of the TFR layer. The metal surface in these trenches and holes are then removed, e.g., etched back in an acid solution. Although the above methods of creating TFR structures are effective for the manufacture of TFR structures on flat surfaces, this process is not suited to device substrates that have various surface features. For example, modern display technologies, such as TFT-LCDs, employ a design in which the liquid crystal cell is sandwiched between a glass substrate on the outer surface, and a plastic film on the inner surface of the TFT array.
