A: Go to the catalog of the music recording studio in which the recording took place, and look at the credits section of the CD. It will list who put in what amount of music transcription time to create the music notation that you are looking at. Chances are, the performer who played the melody you are interested in is listed in there somewhere. (It is possible that you are looking at a song that was transcribed for the album in which it was recorded, and not one that was created specifically for that recording. That is why I gave the original question an upvote, so that you have to look through every album to check.) Comparative characterization of traditional and molecular methods for identification of phytopathogenic actinomycetes. The main aim of the present study is to investigate the accuracy of phenotypic characterization methods to discriminate among representatives of the genera Actinobacillus, Pseudomonas, Streptomyces, Streptosporangium, and Saccharomonospora in comparison with DNA based methods (ribotyping, rep-PCR and AFLP). The isolates (53) from soil samples were characterized in comparison with reference species belonging to the genera from these four genera. Out of 24 phenotypic methods for characterization of phytopathogenic actinomycetes, only the ISP4 method [Tinoco and Gheiser (1989) Int. J. Syst. Bacteriol. 39:483-489] and agar fermentation method were found to be reliable for genus discrimination. Genera could be discriminated without difficulty with the laboratory methods used. However, the application of both ribotyping and rep-PCR showed no sufficient discrimination between strains of the same genus, except for Streptomyces spp. and Act
