formed of a hollow cylinder with a needle at one end and a plunger movable relative to the cylinder to expel material from the other end of the cylinder. Such devices are well known to those skilled in the art and are used in various applications for injecting fluids into and expelling fluids from various types of vessels or containers. The present invention relates generally to a locking mechanism for a syringe and more specifically to a locking mechanism for a syringe that has a needle and is held in an inverted position in a vial. U.S. Pat. No. 4,637,610 discloses a syringe having a syringe body, a syringe plunger and a needle assembly. The needle assembly is held in an inverted position in a vial such that the needle protrudes from the top end of the vial. A cap is provided to retain the needle assembly in the vial. The cap, however, can be easily disengaged from the needle assembly by an overly enthusiastic user. Furthermore, the cap must be set aside to allow loading of the needle assembly into the vial. As a result of these problems, the needles used in these syringes are often damaged. One solution to this problem has been to form the vial from a transparent material such that the vial is visible to the user. However, the syringe must then be provided with a transparent window in the cap. This window, therefore, obscures the view of the needle, making it difficult for the
