e.g., SOA or other sub-topics) is represented by a binary representation of the term, it is asserted whether there is an exact match or near-match for that term. The best-match represents the full length of the term, and the second-best match (e.g., a near-match) represents a reduced portion of the term. The collection of documents that best match the search term defines a search result set. One example of text-based search is querying an inverted index of terms and a corpus of text. The query would typically include multiple terms. The query would therefore be processed by the inverted index with regard to each term, and the inverted index would return a list of documents in which the inverted index has identified that term. The query would then be processed by the corpus of text with regard to each term, and the corpus of text would return a list of documents in which the corpus of text has identified that term. Both the inverted index and the corpus of text would normally be paired with a term identifier so that, for a given query, the inverted index search can be filtered to return only results pertaining to the term identifier. When the search is performed on a large corpus, the number of resulting query response documents can be quite large. When a search term is very short, it may not result in any best or near-best matches.Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton receives a standing ovation after delivering a speech to the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee at the New York Hilton Midtown Hotel in New York, Sunday, May 19, 2016. But what I heard from one of the conservative protesters has stuck with me. "Hillary Clinton is incredibly dangerous," he told me. "She's got a total double standard, but I will tell you this: If she wins, it will be rigged." That crowd felt like
