In this documentary, Dr. Joe Dispenza shares with you the hidden truth of your life. You are not the body that you see, but a much greater 'you'. Learn how you can heal your body and reclaim your life from illness, disease, and death. The most widespread belief in the inception of sleep and nighttime awakenings is that of the evolving toddler. The child's brain continues to develop, and thus are a number of changes that occur to the developing brain. Changes in dopamine, the developing serotonin system, and/or the noradrenergic system. These systems of the brain are involved in arousal, sleep, and circadian activity, thus making the stage of sleep and nighttime awakenings very important to the brain and development of the child. The brain is a complicated organ, however, and more than just basic chemistry can be involved in the child's ability to fall asleep and nighttime awakenings. If there is a problem in the brain at this age, it can manifest itself in many ways, such as learning difficulties, or attention problems. In short, the developing brain of a child is constantly developing, and every aspect of its development is extremely important to neurological health. A few specific changes are the most common that are thought to lead to behavioral changes in the toddler, along with more general changes in the brain, i. In more specific areas of the brain, such as the dopamine and noradrenergic system, the neurotransmitter dopamine plays a major role in regulating sleep and neurological health. There are also some changes that happen in the noradrenergic system when the baby is born that effect the baby's state of sleep. In humans, dopamine is made by the neurons in the midbrain. One of the primary function of dopamine is to regulate important body functions. In animals, dopamine regulates the heart, blood pressure, body temperature, hunger, orgasm, and even pain. In the present day, dopamine is one of the most important neurotransmitters in the brain. With over 100 subtypes of D2 and D3 receptors, it is important to understand what these dopamine receptors are, where they are expressed in the brain, and the effect that they have on different areas of the brain. Certain types of dopamine are involved in controlling motor activity, such as the release of dopamine and noradrenaline, the neurotransmitters that regulate movement. The name noradrenaline is derived from the noradrenal glands - a pair of glands located on
